U.S. tech stocks have ended the day sharply down, capping off a week of heavy losses, fueled by wobbling investor confidence in the AI boom. The NASDAQ exchange had its worst performance since the COVID pandemic. Anthropic, which made its stock market debut on Thursday, lost most of its gains, closing about 9 percent lower. Here's Faisal Islam.

We've seen the NASDAQ, the tech-heavy stock market in New York, fall 6 percent today. It's 10 percent down this week, 20 percent down from peak, and back where it was at the beginning of the year. And you'll remember that only yesterday, they were ringing the bell, Anthropic, with their one and a half trillion valuation, this company, and it was thought to be part of a new age of AI and tech finance raising money, and that was true.

However, given what's happened today, people are starting to ask the question as to whether these pictures represent perhaps the top of the market. There's a lot of nervousness, a lot of fragility. The opening of the markets on Monday will be one to watch.

President Trump has threatened a ban on U.S. firms building AI data centers abroad. Mr. Trump suggested he hadn't yet discussed the matter with his officials, and it's unclear if it will become policy.

Meta and Anthropic are among U.S. firms intending to build data centers overseas. He made the surprise announcement at a press conference after returning from Asia. "Not allowing data centers to go into other countries, 'cause China will take all of them, and we're not allowing that to happen. And we're gonna put tremendous penalties on companies that try and do it. They wanna build now one in Finland, and we're not allowing that to happen."

Russia has launched an apparent double-tap attack on the busy center of the Ukrainian city of Kryvyi Rih, President Zelenskyy's hometown. Two people were killed, including a seven-year-old boy and a female paramedic who'd rushed to the scene after the initial missiles hit. Anna Pizarro reports.

Several videos posted online show extensive damage in the center of Kryvyi Rih, with many buildings on fire, ambulances attending, and paramedics carrying the wounded on stretchers. Officials say at least 40 people have been injured. Local media report a restaurant, hospital, and apartment buildings were hit by the missile attacks, which were then followed by drone strikes.

Earlier on Friday, Ukraine had suffered what President Zelenskyy called one of the biggest Russian attacks of the war, which also saw Russian missiles land in Poland. The Polish prime minister, Donald Tusk, said everything had pointed to them not being stray.

The Saudi-led coalition that's fighting Yemen's Houthis says it struck the Red Sea port of Hodeidah to destroy capabilities of the Houthi movement. Hodeidah is the main port bringing food and other supplies into Houthi-controlled northern Yemen.

It said the facilities in the port were used in smuggling operations and the transport of weapons and ballistic missiles.

A senior Pentagon official says the Iran war has cost the U.S. military nearly $50 billion. Arthur Miller, who's in charge of managing defense procurement, said the figure included munitions, equipment replacement costs, and operational costs. It doesn't include damages to U.S. bases in the Gulf.

Turkey's environment minister says the U.N. climate conference he's presiding over is close to the finish line, but not there yet, as delegates continue to haggle over watering down commitments to abolishing fossil fuels.

Murat Kurum was speaking after Friday's deadline passed without agreement, following a summit which has inspired little hope of a breakthrough despite glaring evidence of a worsening climate crisis.

France's minister of ecological transition, Monique Barbut, said the world mustn't give up on climate action. "We cannot be announcing to the world that we are now getting to 1.5 increase in the temperature and do business like if nothing was happening. It's not the north, it's not the south. For many of the people in the world, it's a question of survival."

The El Salvador military says two of its soldiers have been killed and two others injured in a blast while working with explosive material during a deployment to Haiti. But the military did not say what kind of explosives they were working with.

President Nayib Bukele last month deployed more than 2,000 troops to fight powerful armed gangs in Haiti.

Senators in France have passed a controversial bill offering law enforcement more legal protection if they use their firearms. They'll now be presumed to have acted lawfully unless there's proof to the contrary.

The bill has received strong support from right-wing parties, but opposition activists say it amounts to a license to kill, and left-wing parliamentary groups hope to prevent it becoming law by appealing to the Constitutional Council.
